How do you teach courage?

The trend towards participatory learning approaches means that students are increasingly called on to speak up in defence of their values and boundaries in classrooms and practicum settings. This is particularly true for social work students; the ability of social workers to ‘speak up’ is central to their professional resilience, effectiveness in helping relationships and ability to advocate for social justice. We can work to create safe classrooms supporting open discussion, reflection and rehearsal of transparency skills, and we can teach students what they might say. Still, when faced with real world ‘difficult conversations’, fear of the consequences often keeps students silent.

Our project sought strategies to help students learn how to brave potential negative consequences in order to speak their truth. In a practicum seminar course (SOWK 316), the everyday struggles with practicum supervisors, colleagues and service users became emotionally engaging learning opportunities around which to build curriculum supporting students to have difficult conversations in a safe way.

The Project

With past students, we developed new curriculum including:

- An original model for how to have a difficult conversation
- A wallet card and learning activity asking students to ‘play their difficult conversation card’ in a real-world situation
- Story-telling by past students
- Moral courage self-reflection measures
- Emotional regulation activities
- Role plays
- Small group discussions

With current students, we are evaluating the new curriculum through focus groups, an online survey and pre/post measures.

A Difficult Conversation is when we brave social or emotional risks to speak up to protect our values or boundaries

ASK

if a difficult conversation is needed

ACT

on your plan for the conversation

ASSESS

the safety of having the conversation

ARRANGE

space for the conversation

AFFIRM

your right to choose whether or not to have the conversation

ACKNOWLEDGE

shared goals and positive intent

The Early Findings

How do students say they have changed?

“I react to it with more compassion. I've come to understand that difficult conversations are not just a selfish act of needing to say what I have to say but involve two people and I now make room for the other party to respond”

“Now my instinct is to ask questions before making conclusive or labelling statements.”

What activities helped?

“I enjoyed hearing other people’s experiences with difficult conversations as it allowed me to see various communication styles. I also really enjoyed the concreteness and clarity of the 6 A model”.

“When the fourth year students came I really enjoyed that, and it was effective. I think because peer to peer learning is something that I can engage with, with more ease… I also like the 6A’s small card handout it was cute, and helpful”

“Even if it wasn’t my issue we were talking about, classmates had very unique and effective methods of handling situations that I never would have thought of”.

Acknowledgements

We gratefully acknowledge the financial support for this project provided by UBC Vancouver students via the Teaching and Learning Enhancement Fund. We thank all the SOWK 316 students who have participated in the development and evaluation of the project.